Safer Maritime Systems

Key Messages:

- There will be 40m people working in shipping by 2030 so we need to talk about how to build a safer maritime transition and a just maritime transition.
- Radical collaboration is called for. This means joining up with people you may not usually think about working with.
- We need to be bold, be brave and use our imagination to drive big complex system change and walk into a green future with everyone on board.
- We may be at different stages of our technological advancements, but we can't leave anyone behind. We need collaboration and partnerships across the system

Outcomes:

- We need to facilitate social dialogue between seafarers, unions, and ship owners to retain and upskill existing talent and attract new talent.
- We need to create new pathways to upskill people to build a safer environment.
- We need to think outside of our own bubble, have better knowledge and understanding of each part of the supply chain – their objectives, timelines, and ambitions – and trust each other when sharing information.
- We need room and space to accept each other's point of view, and work together to co-create a clear vision based on ambition, but also reality and action.
- Regulation will be a key driver to success.
- We need to build capacity – recruiting, educating and offer more attractive jobs for women.
- We need safer jobs.
- We need to link up decarbonisation requirements, ocean health and coastal communities.
- Existing silos include the north/south divide, sea-side/land-side and different technologies. We need to break these down.
- There's a big fear of change, especially from incumbents who are profiting at the moment, and who may feel that sharing information is a business liability.
- Lack of young people coming into the system.
- We need a fail-safe and fool proof approach to safety to prevent accidents and fatalities.
- Governance, insurance, and finance can act as mechanisms to drive action.
