Good examples of lessons learned and best practices

- Building on the existing processes and continuous learning
- Enhancing the technical capacity and context-specific knowledge
- Supporting cohorts and networks
- Learning from the practice
- Moving away from donor-driven programming to country-driven capacity-building
- Raising awareness, engaging stakeholders, and communicating effectively
- Fostering collaborative partnerships and building alliances

Considerations for ensuring and enhancing country ownership of capacity-building efforts

- Enhancing policy coherence and institutional arrangements at the national level
- Fostering inclusive and long-term engagement of stakeholders and the integration of cross-cutting issues
- Improving vertical and horizontal institutional interactions and processes
- Mobilizing finance for sustained and long-term capacity-building efforts
- Ensuring continuous improvements in capacity-building

Agenda item 4 (a) – Part IV

Summary of submissions

(b) Identifying capacity gaps and needs, both current and emerging, and recommending ways to address them

Salient points from the submissions:

- A necessary shift is required from donor-driven and project-based programming frameworks with pre-determined outcomes and qualitative indicators to country-driven and programmatic approaches with adaptive management and capacity retention strategies.
- Co-evaluation of capacity-building needs and priorities, co-creation of knowledge and capacity-building outcomes, and collaborative partnerships are important to ensure capacity-building efforts cater to country-specific needs, are sensitive to the power dynamics between the providers and recipients of capacity-building, and are inclusive of the local and indigenous knowledge and experience.
- The way in which capacity-building efforts are designed, financed, implemented, and evaluated have implications on the enhancement (or lack thereof) of country ownership in the process and over time.
- Coordination mechanisms are crucial for improving the country ownership and capacity retention, and could be fostered through enhanced institutional arrangements and networks, improved communications, and updated legal mandates.
- The interlinkages between capacity-building and elements of ACE are key in ensuring various groups of stakeholders are aware of and actively engaged in the ongoing efforts and the built capacity would be retained and strengthened over time.
